

PRACTICE FOCUS

James Dougherty is a principal attorney in Offit Kurman’s Government Contracting Practice Group. James has extensive experience in counseling and representing technology companies and government contractors in a broad range of transactional and litigation environments. His experience in U.S. government contracts law covers compliance counseling, transaction negotiation, rights in and protection of intellectual property and qui tam, claims and bid protest litigation at both the federal and state level. James also has extensive experience with public sector technology transactions, commercial software, IP licensing and related transactions and general corporate compliance.

His unique expertise and experience in technology and government contracts law, in conjunction with his experience as a general counsel in public and private companies, allows him to offer comprehensive counsel to both traditional and non-traditional government contractors, and commercial technology companies.

James has served as the general counsel of several public and private technology companies where he led all legal, compliance and risk management functions. He has also served in other senior in-house roles with leading technology companies such as Cisco Systems and Intel, and as counsel with an AMLaw 50 law firm in both Washington, D.C. and San Francisco. He began his legal career as an officer in the U.S. Army Judge Advocate General’s Corps, where he served as a Commissioner on the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals.
